CHAPTER X LOVE A poor stenographer-- The positive youwj lady under altered circumstances -- Miss Gentles s story -- A hard road for tender feet -- Social and sentimental - - A misunderstanding--Which is made right in the only way -- My boss invites us to dinner -- Another kind of woman -- A woman s shrewdness --The social gift -- At the opera -- Business and pleasure -- Sarah on Mrs. Dround It was a hot day in August three years after the trial; I was sitting in Carmichael s office trying to get a breath of fresh air from his west windows. I called old Peters and asked him to send me up a stenographer. Haven t a good one in the place, Mr. Harrington, he said. All the smart ones are off on their vacation. There s Miss Gentles, though -- the old man generally keeps her for himself, but he s gone home by this time. Send up anything so long as it can write! Well, she ain t much good, Peters replied. I had my head down behind my desk when the stenographer came in, and I began to dictate without looking up. These stenographer ladies were all of a piece to me, ---pert, knowing misses, -- all but Miss Harben: she was fifty and sour, and took my letters like biting off thread. This one evidently wasn t in her class, for pretty soon she sang out: ---...
