Nijhoff; London: Williams Norgate.) Parts VII.-X., 1; r 14s. net each.--The first half-dozen instalments of this work having already been noticed in these columns, it only remains for us to repeat, now that the concluding instalments have made their appearance, that the unique series of reproductions constituting the work cannot fail to be of the utmost value alike to the connoisseur interested in the great masters of the Low Countries and to the art student. To the latter, especially, their importance cannot be overrated, on account of the insight they give into the many and diverse methods pursued by these old masters. They show, too, that these masters, numbering nearly a hundred...
